Safaris to the Kruger Park, which is roughly the size of a small country, are always popular.

The area first became protected in 1989, just before the Boer War, after a campaign by Paul Kruger.

It took a few years before visitors discovered the park. In 1927, a total of 3 tourist vehicles entered the park.

By 1955, visitors flocked to the park in numbers exceeded 10,000 a year, prompting extensive development.

Adjacent to the Kruger on its Western Boundary are a number of private game reserves, including the Phinda Private Game Reserve.

The Kruger Park is a year-round destination, but there is a seasonal difference in climate. The climate is subtropical.

The wet season (summer), is from November to March. This is when the Kruger Park receives most of its rainfall.

However, for birdwatchers, the wet season is the ideal time to visit the Kruger Park, as this is when the birdlife is at its peak.

The wet season is also the best time to see baby animals, as most animals calve at the beginning of the season.

Luxury resorts in and around the Kruger Park are not cheap, but offer services such as massage and spa treatments.

Overland Safaris in a tour group are the most economical way to see Kruger Park. These group tours are the most popular.

The bush of the Kruger Park can also be experienced on hiking tours. These walks are conducted by experienced guides.
