Honolulu is broken into four areas: Downtown, Manoa, Waikiki, and Waimanalo/Kaneohe.

Before proceeding to search for a rental in Honolulu, you should pick the areas that most appeal to you.

It is important to know how much you can afford to pay in rent and still have money left for your other expenses.

The majority of rental in Honolulu managers require a full-credit check, a security deposit, and a lease agreement.

You will be asked to sign a legally binding lease. Make sure you are clear on what utilities, taxes, and other fees are included in the rent.

In Downtown, rental rates can be quite low per month for an unfurnished studio that houses a single person.

For several thousand dollars per month, you can rent a three-bedroom plantation-style bungalow in the Manoa area.

For this area of rental in Honolulu, the average price is high but that is indicative of the high quality of the area.

Manoa is located on the southwestern edge of Oahu. Beaches in this area are pristine. A one-bedroom apartment can be found for a few thousand dollars a month.

A few thousand dollars a month will get the renter a two-bedroom apartment with ocean views. For a three-bedroom house, you will need to spend more.

Waikiki is located on the southern end of Oahu. This area is popular with surfers and beach lovers. Rental prices are high, but the quality is excellent.

If you are planning to obtain a rental in Honolulu in Waikiki, you must be extremely aggressive in your search. Spending more per month will net you an unfurnished two-bedroom cottage in a gated community.

Finally, when looking for a rental in Honolulu, Waimanalo/Kaneohe is another area to consider. Rental prices are lower than in the other areas, but the quality is still high.

Leasing a rental in Honolulu can be a trying experience. Prices vary greatly, but if you go in with a budget and a clear idea of what you want, you can find a great rental.
