^I'll figure that out . . . when I get the time.~

^I really don't know how to start!~

^I really should write my research paper!~

This common dilemma is expressed over and over again by many people everywhere. The good news

There are three main reasons for research papers:

1. To help you to piece together information from different sources and cohesively put it back
2. To help you develop good written and oral communication skills.
3. To help you to figure out how to find information.

Not knowing how to write properly can make your academic life disorganized, stressful and chaotic

1. Choose or Brainstorm Your Topic: Sometimes a topic is given to you, or you may have your own
2. Determine the Scope: Once you've scanned the internet or library and learned a little more
3. Research: By now you have an idea of your topic and have scanned the subject area. You have
4. Outline Your Paper: An outline is an organized plan for your paper. Develop an outline by s
5. Create the First Draft: The first draft should be written after you have completed your res
6. Revise, Revise, Revise! Revision of a paper should actually take longer than writing the fi
7. Proofread: This is the time for nit-picky editing to insure that there are no mistakes. Som
