You might think that selling yourself short is a sure way to not be a success in the ghost writing

This is especially so when you've started to break into the field and you're a ghost writer --

But let's face some facts. First time authors are often people with no real money or skills to

I know what I'm talking about, and I can create a decent, well-written work of cheap ghost writing

Most other ghost writers I know are only as capable I am, but many of them do charge the highest

It might be worthwhile to consider charging less, or negotiating a deal with such a ^first time

This works out to be less ^greedy~ on my part and more of a service that I provide for authors

Also, some of these authors simply don't know what they're doing and need a guiding hand to help

It just isn't like that 90% of the time. An advance comes after a deal has been negotiated with

People like that don't need to face down what looks like to them to be a million dollar price

These clients need literally cheap or inexpensive ghost writers. They don't need to spend a small

Help them. Consider bargaining and bartering at a lower price sometimes, and not at a higher price
