A writer who must work a full-time job to support himself will struggle to find the time to work

On the other hand, I've met writers who were clearly working on projects, or toiling away at a

How to avoid such burnout? Well, in my own career, in addition writing the books I cared about

And never for a moment did I feel that I was selling myself out. Let's get something straight:

In my own case, the answer is fairly simple. Envision the thought process like this: I draw two

But from time to time, an opportunity arises that is in the no-man's-land between the circles.

Then, you ask yourself if the project is something that you could be proud of. If you would re

Every show, every project has its limitations. You must use certain characters, must get them

You must find ways to amuse yourself while writing, to stretch your skills by trying something

And if that approach is good enough for the Bard, it's good enough for me.
